

Gun sales soar in days after election

NEWS 24/7

Washington Free Beacon

by: WFB Staff

Thursday, November 8, 2012

A customer checks out a Barrett .50 caliber rifle at a gun store in Fort Worth, Texas shortly after Barack Obama was elected president in 2008. News channels across the country report that local gun stores are seeing increases in demand for guns and concealed weapons' permits two days after President Barack Obama's re-election victory.

Photo Credit: AP

News channels across the country report that local gun stores are seeing increases in demand for guns and concealed weapons' permits two days after President Barack Obama's reelection victory.

CBS12 News, from Augusta, Ga., spoke to Butch Roberson, owner of Carolina Outdoors, who said the rise comes from "the discussion on gun control. It's been talked about for years and years."

He added, "Any time you have an election like you did last night that you have people that are fearful that certain types of guns are going to be banned."